"After that Titanic movie, I realized there was a lot of attention on me and I wanted to focus on something meaningful," DiCaprio tells Us.

Leo: My Global Warming Crusade

DiCaprio brings his pet cause to the big screen

LEONARDO DICAPRIO HAS LONG BEEN one of Hollywood's most private citizens. But there is one thing the Oscar-nominated actor is more than willing to discuss: the environment. DiCaprio, 32 (who dates model Bar Refaeli, 22), spoke with Us at France's Cannes Film Festival about The 11th Hour, the documentary on global warming he coproduced, cowrote and narrates.

Q: Was it difficult to sum up this subject in a film?

Yes. These are complicated issues and cannot be put into a format of digestive baby food that is spoon-fed.

Q: What can Americans do to help? They can vote with their dollars. Purchase from companies that have come up with alternatives for the future. Look at the Toyota Prius. [Its success] has shown automakers that there is a demand for alternative vehicles. And now the auto industry knows that we cannot go on with business as usual with gas-guzzling vehicles.

"We're the largest polluters," DiCaprio (working on 11th) says of the U.S.

Q: People sometimes dismiss celebrities getting involved with issues.

I am completely aware of the fact that my mere attachment — being someone from Hollywood — will garner a certain amount of skepticism and criticism. Why should we listen to this person? I want to pose myself as a concerned citizen, not an expert.
